“It’s your business” is more than a mere slogan or concept to Charlotte Drew. It is the manner in which she assists each and every client. “We approach each client’s case, whether it’s a business transaction, family matter, litigation or arbitration, from a business perspective,” she says. “In our litigation practice, for example, we assume each and every case we accept will be tried, and we don’t take cases that we are not willing to place before a judge, jury, or arbiter. But to do that, we have to evaluate not only whether our clients’ goals can be achieved, but also whether it makes practical and economic sense for our clients to invest time, money, and resources into a case.” Believing the clients’ success is a cornerstone of her own, Charlotte has a history of success in both the boardroom and the courtroom, and she believes there is no substitute for experience.

“My clients invest significant time and resources into their business and legal issues, and they come to me with the expectation that their objectives be accomplished.” Since no two cases are alike and each case requires individual attention, Charlotte’s creativity and imagination are what take her cases beyond the average legal representation. “Extensive preparation and a thorough working knowledge of each case are essential to effective representation and a positive outcome.” It is this personal attention that sets Charlotte apart and what has made her a respected advocate.

“Attorneys must also have the resolve and tenacity to seek out solutions quickly and efficiently while fostering ongoing relationships and business.” Charlotte believes that short-term success may be a hollow victory if the cost is loss of family, partnership, or business relationships, or the loss of future business. “When appropriate, my focus is not just on whether a current deal can be successfully negotiated or a favorable verdict or judgment can be achieved. An attorney has to keep an eye on the horizon while focusing on the matter at hand. I work with my clients toward not just short-term success, but long term prosperity and growth.”

Charlotte assists businesses from formation through complex commercial transactions and litigation. She advises clients and prepares documents for real estate acquisitions, sales, and leases. Charlotte has experience with complex commercial and residential construction matters, including contract drafting, collection and lien issues, and project disputes. Charlotte also handles complex divorce and family law matters (both traditional litigation as well as collaborative law) involving significant property disputes, child support and custody issues, and premarital and marital agreements. Charlotte’s love for horses and experience in the horse business inspires her to assist clients with, draft documents for, and litigate equine and farm/ranch law issues, including stablekeepers’ liens, grazing leases, horse ownership and valuation, and other matters.

Drew & McCallum PLLC assists its clients with most general civil matters. In addition to Charlotte’s others areas of practice, the firm also assists employers and employees with employment issues and litigation; handles consumer transactions and deceptive trade practice matters, assists creditors and debtors with collections issues, and has extensive experience with state and federal court litigation, arbitration, and other forms of dispute resolution.
